To study the effect of hydrogen sulfide (H2S) on the vascular reactivity in the mesenteric artery isolated from spontaneous hypertensive rats (SHR). Vascular reactivity in mesenteric artery isolated from SHR and Wistar-Kyoto rats (WKY) were measured by isometric force recording system. Maximal response to phenylephrine, acetylcholine, sodium nitroprusside, and potassium chloride were recorded. The endothelium was removed by using 1-Naphthalenacetic acid (NAA). In endothelium-intact mesenteric artery isolated from SHR, the contractile response to phenylephrine was weaker than the contractile response of WKY. Both the concentration-response curve to phenylephrine and pD2 of phenylephrine were lower in the SHR. After the endothelium was removed, the contractile response to phenylephrine and pD2 of phenylephrine were markedly enhanced. There was no difference in the contractile responses to acetylcholine and sodium nitroprusside between the endothelium-intact and endothelium-denuded artery in both WKY and SHR. In endothelium-intact mesenteric artery, there was no difference in the vascular reactivity in mesenteric artery isolated from SHR and WKY after incubation with NaHS. However, the vascular reactivity in the mesenteric artery isolated from SHR was markedly inhibited by incubation with NaHS. The relaxing effect of NaHS was similar between the endothelium-intact and endothelium-denuded mesenteric artery. H2S attenuates the vascular contraction
